A Late Word About Suits

IN THE long story of spring and summer suits there are so many interesting chapters dealing with suits of unusual character, that the fashion reporter is apt to forget those that are plain and unpretentious. But these are most useful and most important.

While anyone may manage to get along without an elaborate or formal suit—if she must—the plainer street suit is essential and merits study, especially as it contrives to be as smart as its dressier kindred, and by more subtle means. It has arrived, in the company of others more pretentious, for summer time and all of them entice the fashion writer to begin over again in writing the story of suits.

Among formal suits there are those that consist of a one-piece dress with coat to match, in which a bodice of foulard or crepe de chine or other material is joined to a cloth skirt. The colors in the silk body suggest those used in embellishing the coat with embroidery or otherwise. The French love this elaboration of the tailored suit and an imported model reveals red and blue foulard in the body of a dress joined to navy serge in the skirt by an embroidered girdle in blue at a low waistline.

For the business of living every day and fitting into whatever the day may bring such practical suits as those pictured are late acquisitions in the shops. It will be noticed that their skirts are longer and wider than skirts have been, that coats are open at the front and provided with either a narrow belt or wide girdle of the material. One of them is split at the sides and employs buttons as a decoration while the other relies upon triangles of the material as a finish.
